Navigating the culture of personal space

Linda Pflugfelder, proprietor of the Garden of Abingdon Bed & Breakfast on the West End of Toronto, is a frequent participant in the cultural conversations that form the backbone of her business. She and her husband, Paul, have spent many years in the United States, where they were struck by the difference in personal space. Linda, like many Canadians, is accustomed to the idea of personal space, which she describes as "a comfortable zone of distance that one maintains with others. You don't want to be too close, because it can be uncomfortable. But you also don't want to be too far away, because it can be lonely.

In Canada, personal space is often referred to as "intimate space." It is a very important concept in Canadian culture, and it is something that we take for granted. In the United States, personal space is often referred to as "personal space." It is a concept that is not as well understood in the United States, and it is something that can be difficult to navigate for those who are not used to it.
